Parent and Infant Mental Health Service Guide

(pregnancy - 5 years)

Nottinghamshire County Council

BEST START IN LIFE

This document sets out the Nottingham and Nottinghamshire Parent and Infant Mental Health Service Offer, providing an overview of local support available to families from pregnancy through to early childhood (up to 5 years). It is designed to support practitioners to understand and navigate the range of core commissioned services available across the system, that directly support parents and carers with their mental health, parent-infant relationships and infant mental health.

If there are any concerns about bonding, attachment, parental mental health, infant development or safeguarding, seek advice and refer to appropriate services as early as possible. Early intervention is extremely important and can significantly improve outcomes for both parent and child.

How to use the guide

The guide brings together key information about services in one place, including what they offer, eligibility criteria, and how to facilitate access to appropriate support based on level of need. It includes a broad spectrum of provision from universal health visiting and maternity contacts, parenting programmes through to talking therapies and specialist perinatal mental health and parent–infant relationship services. It is intended to support effective signposting and appropriate referrals.

The guide is structured into three key life-stage sections:

Section 1: Pregnancy Page 4

Section 2: Birth to 2 years Page 17

Section 3: 2 to 5 years Page 38

The guide has attempted to structure the levels of support using the Thrive model of support, organising services within each life stage section into four tiers:

- Thriving and Getting Advice
  - more universal support, early information, and prevention
- Getting Help
  - more targeted support for emerging or mild to moderate needs
- Getting More Help
  - more specialist interventions for more complex presenting needs
- Getting Risk Support
  - more intensive and crisis support for those at highest risk

Services are broadly categorised into these sections to help guide practitioners in identifying appropriate support options for the presenting needs. Some services could sit across different tiers but have been included in the first appropriate section.

There are two additional sections within this resource:

Section 4: Local online resources Page 49

Offering further information and links to online support available.

Section 5: Supporting Parent-Infant Relationships Page 50

With some guidance on relationship-focused conversations and links to further information and resources.

Please note this does not cover services and support available for practitioners or exploration of services offered across the community and voluntary sector.

This guide is for guidance only, please use your professional judgement and consider risk at all times.

Crisis Line:

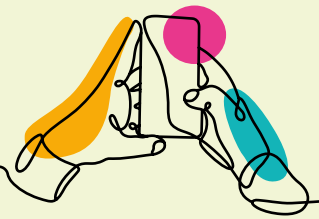

Nottingham and Nottinghamshire have a crisis line which is open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, to people of all ages.

Parents may experience a range of emotions during pregnancy and the early years, including joy, uncertainty, anxiety, stress, loss, trauma or difficulties bonding with their baby. These experiences can affect how parents feel about and relate to their infant.

Every interaction with a family is an opportunity to support and strengthen parent–infant relationships. By noticing, listening and having supportive, non-judgemental conversations, practitioners can promote infant mental health, identify emerging difficulties and ensure families access the right support at the earliest opportunity.

Section 5: Supporting Parent-Infant Relationships

Guidance for relationship-focused conversations

The Department of Health and Social Care's Reflecting on Parent–Infant Relationships guidance (2024) recommends a three step framework for identifying relationship difficulties. Within this there are three simple prompts that can help you as practitioners to explore the parent's experience of their relationship with their baby.

Step 1: Starting the conversation

The first step of the framework looks at using the 3 questions to start the conversation with the caregiver about the relationship they have with their baby:

1. What is your baby like?
2. How do you think your baby feels when they are upset, happy or seeking comfort?
3. How has it been for you becoming a parent to this baby?

Observing the relationship between a baby and their parent or carer is a valuable addition to asking these prompt questions. Although we cannot ask babies about their relationship with their parent or carer, by watching them closely we can begin to understand their experience of the relationship.

Step 2: Identifying potential strengths and areas of need

This step of the framework looks at further exploring the answers the caregiver gave in step 1, especially if the answers raised concerns for you. This step of the framework covers the use of clinically validated assessment tools to investigate further.

Step 3: Signposting, referring or providing further support

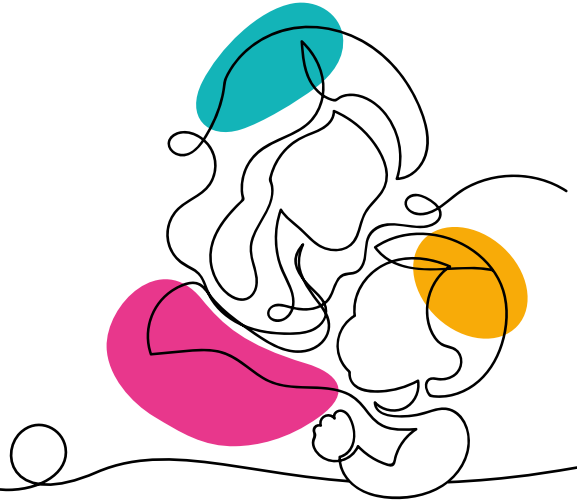

The final step of the framework looks at referring families and caregivers for additional support if you think it is appropriate.

Principles for relationship-focused conversations

Conversations about parent–infant relationships should be embedded within routine contacts across pregnancy and the early years. As Practitioners it's important to adopt a curious, compassionate and strengths-based approach, recognising that relationship difficulties can often be linked to wider experiences such as parental mental health difficulties, trauma, social isolation, domestic abuse, financial pressures or adverse childhood experiences.

Key principles include:

- ✔ Create a safe and non-judgemental environment.
- ✔ Be genuinely interested in the parent's experience of their baby.
- ✔ Notice and acknowledge positive interactions and strengths. For example, you could reflect on what you have seen: "Did you notice how your baby looked at you and calmed as you spoke to them and made eye contact? That was lovely to see and will help your baby grow and develop."
- ✔ Keep the baby "in mind" throughout the conversation, considering their emotional experience and communication.
- ✔ Explore both the parent's feelings about the baby and their understanding of the baby's feelings and needs.
- ✔ Recognise cultural diversity in parenting practices and family relationships.
- ✔ Consider the role of fathers, partners and other important caregivers.
